The Jonas & Magdalena Freer House is a distinctive example of 18th-century stone domestic architecture in the town and county. One of only eighteen early stone houses surviving in the town, the Freer house represents an important artifact of New Paltz's formative era and cultural development. Stone houses are iconic in the history of the town and Ulster County, and they are important symbols of the Dutch heritage in the Hudson Valley. Unlike the more numerous and less permanent wood buildings built in the 18th century, stone houses have survived into the 21st century. Although generally revered as relics of a primitive past, they were the elite houses in their period and provide valuable evidence of architectural traditions, construction methods and material life.

Built in ca. 1798, the small one-room plan stone house was erected as an addition to a pre-existing log dwelling, which illustrates, although the log dwelling does not survive, the presumed sequence of stone house construction, that is, a number of sections originating with a log or wood frame building that was eventually replaced with a stone section or removed.

The New York State Historic Preservation Office has determined that 18th-century stone houses are individually eligible for the National Register and that the changes that have occurred in subsequent historical periods contribute to that significance. In the New Paltz context, all of the surviving stone houses in the town are worthy of local designation and protection.
